Greetings!

Summer is coming to a close end, and now it's time to analyze our skin after all that fun in the sun. With weather over 100 degrees this summer, we're bound to show signs of skin damage - dark spots, destroyed collagen and loose skin, fine lines and wrinkles, and uneven skin tone.

If you're already showing signs of sun damage - don't worry, a quick photofacial treatment can help!

What is a Photofacial?

Photofacial involves a series of intense pulsed light to the skin, to improve the appearance of sun damaged skin. The results are younger and healthier looking skin. 96% of patients would recommend the treatment to others, so patient satisfaction is the key to why this treatment is becoming a leading treatment option.

What can Photofacials treat?

Photofacials are used to treat fine lines, wrinkles, enlarged pores and acne scarring by promoting new collagen production. The procedure is also effective for treating age or sun spots, melasma, rosacea, port-wine stains, telangiectasia (broken or dilated blood vessels), redness or flushing, and other skin blemishes. Often referred to as a "Mini-Facelift", your skin will appear tighter, firmer, and smoother as you receive ongoing treatments. Although photofacials are most commonly used on the face, treatments can be done anywhere on the body.

Why Photofacial treatments instead of a facelift?

The biggest advantage of photofacial treatments is that there is no downtime or recovery period. Treatments can be done during your lunch break and you can return to work or resume your regular activities immediately. No surgery means less pain, no danger of life threatening complications and infections, and makes it much more affordable.

How long does each treatment take and does it hurt?

Treatment times range from 20-30 minutes, depending on the area being treated. Often described as a rubber band hitting lightly against the skin, any discomfort can be minimized by a numbing cream.
